NICE THINGS COMMITMENT

1. Morality Before Monetization
2. Products Not Services
3. Unity Of Word And Deed
4. No Anti-Piracy measure

RATIONALE

We all want nice things. Unfortunately, recent corporate trends have made truly nice things increasingly rare. These four commitments are made in an attempt to ensure a level of accountability in this regard.

MORALITY BEFORE MONETIZATION

While capitalism continues as the operating economic model it remains necessary to pursue some amount of money. However, that money should not come through exploitation. Human suffering can never be an acceptable expense.

PRODUCTS NOT SERVICES

Services are fleeting acts, gone when done. Products are tangible goods, yours to own. While the former undoubtedly have their place, the systemic need for coin does not justify forging perpetual money traps.

UNITY OF WORD AND DEED

It's easy to pay lip service and spout rhetoric. Proudly claiming support for whatever cause currently suits one's needs. When it comes to the crunch, too few ever follow through. Talk is cheap, actions have value.

NO ANTI-PIRACY MEASURES

The problem is oversold. The solutions ruin media. And, besides, the only way to really beat the hackers, crackers and phreaks is not to play. Ultimately, it's just not worth it.

SAFEGUARDS

The above is not intended to be set in stone. Amendments may prove necessary either as a result of external developments or simply due to oversight. Such leeway, though well intentioned, obviously offers scope for abuse. While no system is perfect this document, along with any subsequent versions, shall be subject to an ongoing changelog and historical git versioning.

Short of catastrophic data loss, this will allow for critical comparison of any future changes.
